New England Agriculture.

Much has been said about the abandoned farms of New England, and much is to be seen by the traveler who passes through what may be called the blighted sections of Vermont and Massachusetts, in particular. Farms are growing up without cultivation; houses stand with no tenants but bats and owls.

This matter is being made the subject of close official inquiry in the several States, and with somewhat surprising results. It is shown that the abandonment is confined to those localities which in view of railroad development are least favorably situated and whose soil is most rocky and sterile. It is found at the same time that in Massachusetts the acreage under cultivation increases by an encouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the incouraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the increase in t couraging per centage that there is this increase in the localities in which the abandoned farms lay, and that there is a steady advance in the productivenees of the farm area of each of the States. The highest farm values, and therefore the state on window. His meriment and that of the rest of the party from the form of their faces and finished the trip with one-half of their faces beard the other half covered with a leavy scrub.

Mr. William J. Harris, an English Protectionist, is much disturbed by the operations of the McKinley tariff act,

In a letter to the London Economist
Mr. Harris says that "the McKinley tariff is likely to do a great deal more harm to the United Kingdom than any other nation." This can only be if we are buying flom England more than

"Oh, whet are won talking about?"

"Oh, whet are won talking about?" from any other nation commodities from any other nation commodities which we should produce and shall shortly produce in sufficient quantities to meet our wante. It cannot be true at all if, as the Free Traders insist, the consumer pays the tax, for it will make no difference to him where the good are made so long as he must pay the same tax on the loreign and the domestic product.

Mr. Harris knows that the British manufacturer must pay duty before he can bring his wares into this country, and that if we be producing the like article in considerable quantity the foreign manufacturer will never get that duty back. This it is that moves this English writer to seek retaliative measures. He would have a stiff duty on breadstuffs would have a stiff duty on breadstuffs and mest, in order to stir up American and meat, in order to sur up American for falling of the womb and other disfarmers to vote the Democratic ticket.

"Now, Rob," she said, as she hurried out to the platform again, "don't lose that note I gave you; don't take it out of your pocket at all."

"No'm," said the little man, lookin gr wistfully after his mother as the conductor pulled the strap, the driver unscrewed his brake, and the horses, shake in their bells, trotted off with the car. This is entirely clear. It proposes to secure for the Democratic party valuable assistance to put that party in power and through that organization to remove the legislation which is building up American industries and crippling British industries. Our Democratic friends will not thank Mr. Harris for

"Robert Cullen Deems," he answered, politely.

"Where are you going?"

"To my grandma's."

"Let me see that note in your pocket."

Is West Virginia so rich that she has no use for this morney? It would have been better to add it to the appopriation for her representation at the World's Fair, where we expect to get something in return.

But the matter is not ended yet, nor is the solution so easy as the State authorities thought. The point raised at Washington that West Virginia is probably a debtor to the United States may give us further pause. As it is new for the first time, raised, and since the Attorney General has not reached a conclusion, the rest of us may take a little time to think about it.

There is enough in this point togenges the serious attention of West Virginia and to place in a new light the Virginia debt question, which has been seen alfeady in nearly all the lights the prism can show. It may prove to be the point on which that whole question is the solution as a range of the first time, raised, and since the Attorney General has not reached a conclusion, the rest of us may take a little time to think about it.
